In St. Paul the fires were burning freely in the famous lumber district, but there was no indication of the terrible disaster that was to overtake Hinckley the next week. The country had been so long without rain that everyone seemed to think that it must come in a day or two, and there was little apprehension that anything more serious than that which had already happened could occur. Travelers could see a few hundred feet out of the car windows, and as night came on the thin line of flame eating its way through the leaves and underbrush was visible every mile or two.

In St. Paul it was impossible to see the river and the city itself from the heights. Out in the wheat country of the Dakotas the haze seemed to lift a little, but when the grazing country of Montana was reached desolation seemed to reign. For fifty miles at a stretch the plains were black as far as the eye could see. The cattle had been driven back to the mountains, the herders said, in some cases for hundreds of miles. The streams of water and the little lakes, that are the salvation of the country for grazing purposes were dried up, occasionally, but over the mounds in that rolling country there could be seen the approach of the fire, and there was no way to stop it.

At night the fires were especially beautiful. The flame was never more than from six to eight inches high, occasionally it ran in a straight line parallel with the railroad for a distance of several miles. At other times it formed crescents and circles up the sloping sides of some extended knoll. Again there were nests and obtuse angles, and as the smoke rose and filled the air it made it impossible to see clearly for more than a few hundred yards.

In the Rocky mountains it was the same story. Far up the peaks close to the limit of the wood belt, scores of fires could be seen burning brightly, where no hunter could have left his campfire burning. Some of the fires in the mountains, as well as some of those on the plains, were undoubtedly started by locomotive sparks, and some were started by the negligence of hunters who had not extinguished their campfires on leaving for their sport, but over the mounds in that rolling country should be kept on the change.

A clever canine.

Harlow, this far on her way to her home in Jamesville, Wis. Mr. Harlow informs THE CITIZEN that the weather is extremely cold at Gallup, and the citizens thought the fire, which visited that town Wednesday night, under the greatest of difficulty.
